Research Project:

Triggering societal tipping points for sustainable diets (FOODTRIGGERS)

The FOODTRIGGERS project aims to foster the transition towards healthier and more sustainable diets by acting on the social tipping points of food systems, namely those moments in which targeted actions can generate long-lasting systemic change. The approach is systemic and focuses on redesigning personal, social, and external food environments, understood as the set of factors that influence access to, choice, and consumption of food, including prices, availability, marketing, social norms, and public policies. Through participatory co-creation processes, the project seeks to disrupt vicious cycles that promote unsustainable dietary patterns and to activate virtuous cycles. FOODTRIGGERS involves six European countries (Denmark, Finland, Sweden, Italy, Portugal, and Spain), representative of Nordic and Mediterranean diets. The activities are structured around five work streams, including comparative analyses across contexts and social groups, experimental labs on physical and digital food environments, assessments of the impact of price policies, development of sustainability monitoring tools, and the formulation of recommendations to support public policies at national and European levels.

Specific responsibilities within the project and functions to be performed:

The staff of the UNIPI Operating Unit plays a coordinating and applied research role, leading the Rome Food Environment Lab and Work Package 3. In collaboration with Slow Food Lazio and the Chefs' Alliance, it contributes to the selection of pilot restaurants and to the analysis of interventions on menus, communication, and sustainable food practices, assessing their effects on consumers, operational constraints, and integration into business models. The Operating Unit co-designs and monitors new interventions where actions are less structured, promoting processes of co-learning and the dissemination of good practices. In addition, it collaborates transversally with the other Work Packages, supporting consumer behavior research, international comparative analysis, research on policy mixes for sustainable diets in Italy, and stakeholder engagement, awareness-raising, and communication activities.

Maximum number of publications that candidates may submit, including the doctoral thesis, if submitted: 5
